

Question of the Week

A weekly conversation starter for the Body Doubling community — and a gentle on-ramp to the Stoke Q&A library.

Why it works. A single, recurring prompt gives people a low-pressure reason to show up each week — no task, no obligation, just a question they want to answer. It builds rhythm, surfaces the quieter members, and (best of all) every good answer is a candidate to save into our shared Q&A library on Stoke, so the knowledge doesn't scroll away.

The one rule: consistency beats frequency. Same day, same time, every week. Even if a week is quiet, the ritual is doing the work.

Ready-to-use questions

Rotate through the categories so it stays fresh. Aim for questions with no wrong answer — the goal is sharing, not performance.

Focus & getting started

1. What's one task you've been avoiding — and what's the smallest possible first step on it?
2. Are you a morning, afternoon, or late-night brain? Have you tried leaning into it instead of fighting it?
3. What does your ideal focus setup look like — music or silence, tidy or cluttered, alone or with others?
4. What kind of task are you most hoping to body double for this week?

The way our brains work

5. What's a "weird" trick that actually works for you, even if it makes no sense to anyone else?
6. What's something people misunderstand about how your brain works?
7. What's a task your brain treats as "impossible" that's objectively tiny?
8. What's your relationship with to-do lists: lifeline, guilt-pile, or somewhere in between?
9. If your brain were a browser, how many tabs are open right now — and which one is playing music you can't find?

Body doubling & accountability

10. When did you first realize body doubling actually worked for you?
11. Silent co-working or chatty co-working — which one gets you moving, and why?
12. Timer or body double: which helps you start more often?
13. What's one thing you'd love an accountability partner for this month?

Tools & systems

14. What's one app, tool, or system that actually stuck — and how many did you try before it?
15. Paper or digital for capturing thoughts? Defend your choice.
16. What's your go-to way to catch a thought in the moment so it doesn't vanish forever?
17. What's a small change to your space or routine that made a bigger difference than you expected?

Wins, connection & fun

18. What's a small win from this week you're proud of? (No win is too small — that's the rule.)
19. What are you working toward right now, big or small?
20. What's your current hyperfocus or rabbit hole?
21. What's fueling your focus today — coffee, tea, water, chaos?
22. What helps you get back on track after focus slips away?
23. What's something you're learning to stop being hard on yourself about?
24. What's one thing you want to move from your "someday" list into "this month"?

How to post it on Discord

1. Pick your slot and protect it

- Same day & time weekly. Monday morning works well — it frames the week. Pick what fits you and don't move it.
- Use a consistent channel. A dedicated #question-of-the-week keeps answers together, or drop it in your main chat channel for more eyes. Either is fine — just be consistent.
- Pin the current week's question so latecomers can still find and answer it. Unpin when you post the next one.

2. Use a simple, repeatable format

Copy this template each week and swap in the new question. The predictable shape becomes a signal people recognize:

 Question of the Week

Hey everyone! This week's question:

> <paste the question here>

No wrong answers — drop your thoughts below 🗨️
I'll go first in the replies to break the ice.

Answer it yourself first. Post your own reply within a minute or two. Being the first (slightly vulnerable) answer lowers the barrier for everyone else — an empty thread is intimidating; a thread with one honest answer feels safe.

3. Keep it alive during the week

- React to answers with an emoji, or reply to a few. People come back when they feel seen.
- No big ping needed. A weekly ritual shouldn't @everyone. If engagement dips, an occasional @here (online only) is plenty — don't blast 13k for a weekly prompt.
- Rotate categories so it doesn't feel repetitive — a focus question one week, a fun/wins question the next.

4. Turn good answers into something lasting (the Stoke tie-in)

This is the part that quietly grows Stoke. Discord answers scroll away in a day; Stoke's Q&A library keeps them. When a question sparks genuinely useful answers, add a nudge:

💡 Loved these answers. Want to keep this one so it doesn't disappear? Add it to our Q&A library on Stoke — that's our community's external memory:
stoke.community/communities/bodydoublingcom

- Tool-and-system questions (#14–17) are the best ones to route to Stoke — those answers are worth finding again in six months.
- You (or a mod) can seed the library by posting a couple of the best Discord answers into the Q&A there. A visitor who clicks through then sees a living room, not an empty one.

5. Celebrate and archive

- Occasionally screenshot or shout out a favorite answer — it signals that participating is worth it.
- Keep a running list of which questions you've used so you don't repeat too soon (24 above = ~5–6 months of weekly rotation).

Body Doubling · Stoke Community — a reliable place to build a shared, lasting library of tools and tips that work for our minds.